

Illusory Rights Under the Arbitrary and Capricious Standard: Adding Remedial Safeguards to the Judicial Standard of Review Beyond ERISA Denial of Benefits Claims

Javier J. Diaz, Esq.†

I. Introduction .....	393
II. Background.....	396
1. ERISA: Legislative Intent at the Time of Creation - 1974.....	396
2. ERISA’s Place in Employee Benefits: Statutory Background .....	397
3. Trust Law in ERISA.....	399
4. Arbitrary and Capricious: As Applied to ERISA.....	402
III. ERISA’s Federal Common Law: The Supreme Court Sets
Contours for Judicial Review .....	404
1. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch (1989) .....	405
2. Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn (2008).....	406
3. Conkright v. Frommert (2010) .....	408
i. Breyer’s Dissent and Accompanying Scholars .....	410
IV. The Split .....	411
1. Strict Construction: The Arbitrary and Capricious Standard Does Not Apply to All Plan Interpretation Claims Outside of the Denial of Benefits Context. ....	412
i. Second Circuit - John Blair Commc’n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group and Frommert v. Conkright. ....	412
2. Liberal Construction: The Arbitrary and Capricious Standard Applies Outside of the Denial of Benefits Context. ....	414
i. Ninth Circuit - Tibble v. Edison Int’l (2013).....	414

---

† J.D. Seton Hall University School of Law, 2014. I dedicate this Comment to the loving memory of my brother Basilio "Freddy" Diaz. I would like to thank my parents Julio L. Diaz and Esther Sanchez for their teachings and unwavering love. I would also like to thank my brothers Samuel Rodriguez and Julian Diaz for their continued love and support. Finally, I would like to thank the Seton Hall Circuit Review for their edits, suggestions, and dedication to contribute to the market place of ideas.

ii. Sixth Circuit - Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc. (2000) .....	416
iii. Third Circuit - Moench v. Robertson (1995) .....	418
V. Analysis .....	419
1. Weighing in on the Split .....	420
2. Where the Supreme Court Missed its Mark .....	424
3. A Proposed Solution .....	428
VI. Conclusion .....	429

I. INTRODUCTION

The Employee Retirement Income Security Act (“ERISA”) impacts millions of Americans during their working lives and at retirement.<sup>1</sup> Indeed, ERISA has profound implications for health care, as an approximate 1.9 million ERISA health care claims are denied each year.<sup>2</sup> Approximately 45% of private workers in America participate in a qualified ERISA retirement plan.<sup>3</sup> In 2011, multi-employer plans covered 30 million employees.<sup>4</sup> An excess of 150 billion dollars in assets are held in reserve for beneficiaries and private plan participants that have escaped the scrutiny of effective federal regulation.<sup>5</sup> Thus, ERISA impacts millions of plan participants and beneficiaries.

Since ERISA’s enactment, federal circuit courts have continuously disagreed on ERISA provisions.<sup>6</sup> One such disagreement concerns the standard of judicial review that is applied to claims arising out of ERISA

---

<sup>1</sup> See UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, Frequently Asked Questions About Retirement Plans and ERISA, http://www.dol.gov/ebsa/faqs/faq\_compliance\_pension.html (last visited Mar. 6, 2014).

<sup>2</sup> Carole Gresenze, Deborah R. Hensler, David M. Studdert, Bonnie Dombey-Moore & Nicholas M. Pace, A Flood of Litigation?: Predicting the Consequence of Changing Legal Remedies Available to ERISA Beneficiaries, IP 184 RAND HEALTH LAW 8 (1999).

<sup>3</sup> PENSION BENEFIT GUARANTY CORPORATION ANNUAL REPORT, <http://www.pbgc.gov/res/reports/ar2013.html> (last visited Mar. 6, 2014); see also PENSION BENEFIT GUARANTY CORPORATION ANNUAL, <http://www.pbgc.gov/documents/pension-insurance-data-tables-2011.pdf> (last visited Mar. 6, 2014) (Pension Insurance Data: Defined benefit plans cover approximately 35 million private and public sector active workers).

<sup>4</sup> Colleen E. Medill, INTRODUCTION TO EMPLOYEE BENEFITS LAW: POLICY AND PRACTICE, 8 (3rd ed. 2011).

<sup>5</sup> Id.

<sup>6</sup> See e.g. Zurich American Insurance Company v. O’Hara, 604 F.3d 1232 (11th Cir. 2010); U.S. Airways, Inc. v. McCutchen, 663 F.3d 671 (3d Cir. 2011); Pfeil v. State St. Bank & Trust Co., 671 F.3d 585 (6th Cir. 2012); Dudenhoefer v. Fifth Third Bancorp, 2012 U.S. App. LEXIS 18622 (6th Cir. Sept. 5, 2012).

plan interpretation.<sup>7</sup> Specifically, numerous federal circuits have disagreed on the issue of whether the arbitrary and capricious standard of judicial review applies to all or to some practices of fiduciary plan interpretation in ERISA plans that grant discretionary interpretative authority upon the plan administrator.<sup>8</sup> Plan interpretation encompasses several practices within ERISA, such as benefit determinations, determining the scope of fiduciary responsibility, implementing administrative rules in a plan, and determining the formula for benefits calculation.

In ERISA civil cases, the standard of judicial review results in evidentiary implications that are highly outcome determinative.<sup>9</sup> The Supreme Court's decision in Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch dealt with the issue of the standard of judicial review for denial of benefits claims.<sup>10</sup> The Court held that the de novo standard of judicial review controlled review of denial of benefits claims, unless the plan granted discretionary authority upon the administrator, which would result in the application of an arbitrary and capricious standard of review.<sup>11</sup>

The Second, Third, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits have weighed in on when and to what extent the arbitrary and capricious standard applies to interpretative powers outside the denial of benefits context when a plan grants interpretative power upon the plan administrator.<sup>12</sup> The Ninth Circuit has recently added to the inconsistency among the circuits.<sup>13</sup> The Ninth Circuit interpreted Firestone and its progeny to mean that the plain language of the statute grants the fiduciaries uninhibited discretion over all matters concerning plan interpretation, including denial of benefit claims.<sup>14</sup> This interpretation cloaks fiduciaries with the arbitrary and

---

<sup>7</sup> Compare Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2013) with John Blair Commc'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, 26 F.3d 360 (2d Cir. 1994).

<sup>8</sup> Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061, 1072 (9th Cir. 2013); Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., 220 F.3d 702, 711 (6th Cir. 2000), Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553, 565 (3d Cir. 1995); John Blair Commc'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, 26 F.3d 360, 369 (2d Cir. 1994).

<sup>9</sup> See Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101 (1989) (inferring that once a plan grants discretionary authority upon a fiduciary in the denial of benefits context, the less demanding arbitrary and capricious standard of review shift a court's review towards fiduciaries' favor).

<sup>10</sup> Id. at 111.

<sup>11</sup> Id.; see also Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506 (2010) (limiting the application of the Firestone's de novo standard); Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105 (2008) (interpreting Firestone).

<sup>12</sup> Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2013); Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., 220 F.3d 702 (6th Cir. 2000), Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1995); John Blair Commc'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, 26 F.3d 360 (2d Cir. 1994).

<sup>13</sup> Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>14</sup> Id. at 1077.

capricious standard on any plan interpretation decision.<sup>15</sup> The Second Circuit's stands at opposite to the Ninth Circuit. The Second Circuit has refused to expand the arbitrary and capricious standard in Firestone beyond the denial of benefits context.<sup>16</sup> The Third and Sixth Circuits justify the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard outside of the denial of benefits context, but do not state how far the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply to plan interpretation.<sup>17</sup>

Considering most workers do not save enough for retirement,<sup>18</sup> creating remedial safeguards to protect what little monies these workers have is critical to our nation's financial future. Even though Congress has amended ERISA to include criminal and civil provisions, "the protection accomplished by statute has not been sufficient to accomplish Congressional intent."<sup>19</sup> The promotion and creation of ERISA plans by employers are equally important. This comment proposes that the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply to all plan interpretation practices to promote plan creation, and as a result, reviewing courts should adopt broader remedial safeguards when reviewing whether an act is arbitrary and capricious to protect plan participants and beneficiaries.

This comment reviews the origin of, and hence the policy behind, the arbitrary and capricious standard of review, while identifying the extent to which several circuits grant deference to fiduciaries on plan interpretation. Part I of this comment provides a background to Congress's intent in

---

<sup>15</sup> Id. at 1077.

<sup>16</sup> John Blair Commc'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, 26 F.3d 360 (2d Cir. 1994); see, e.g., Asbestos Workers Syracuse Pension Fund by Collins v. M.G. Indus. Insulation Co., 875 F. Supp. 132 (N.D.N.Y. 1995) (stating that the arbitrary and capricious standard of review applies to denial of benefits claims when the plan grants discretion upon the trustee. After John Blair a distinction between claims arising from denial of benefits and claims not arising from denial of benefits arose. The arbitrary and capricious standard was not applied to administrative determinations balancing the interest of plan beneficiaries because the claim was not a denial of benefits claim. Instead, a strict prudent person standard was applied to the administrator's interest determination.); see also Frommert v. Conkright, 738 F.3d 522 (2d Cir. 2013) (explaining that a claim outside of the denial of benefits context, if not already held to adopt an arbitrary and capricious standard, requires review from a higher court to determine the appropriate standard of review.); Hammer v. First UNUM Life Ins. Co., 2005 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 3414 (S.D.N.Y. Mar. 7, 2005) (stating that discretion is conferred upon the administrator when the plan grants such discretion. An exception has not been carved out to revert to de novo review if the claim is not a denial of benefits claim. Hammer involved a denial of benefits claim and a claim for untimely decision rendered from the plan's appeals process.).

<sup>17</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711; Moench, 62 F.3d at 565.

<sup>18</sup> Ruth Helman, Greenwald & Associates, Nevin Adams, Craig Copeland & Jack VanDerhei, The 2014 Retirement Confidence Survey: Confidence Rebounds-for Those With Retirement Plans, EMPLOYEE BENEFIT RESEARCH INSTITUTE, Mar. 2014.

<sup>19</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 8 (stating that ERISA §502(a)(3) provides the opportunity for plan participants and beneficiaries to bring civil suits for equitable and other relief).

enacting ERISA and the subsequent adoption of trust law to fill in gaps in ERISA's remedial provisions. Part II further investigates the meaning of the modern arbitrary and capricious standard as applied to ERISA. Part II sets forth the Supreme Court Firestone decision and its progeny, which create the contours for ERISA judicial review analysis. Part III identifies and captures the split between the Second, Third, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits. In part IV, this comment proposes a resolution to the imbalance between promotion of plan creation and legal simplicity, and the safeguards afforded to plan participants and beneficiaries in the administrative appeals process and judicial arena. Specifically, this comment posits that the arbitrary and capricious standard should continue to control the review of all plan administrators' discretionary interpretation to promote plan creation. Furthermore, this comment recommends the enlargement of evidentiary scope when reviewing an administrator's decision, which would increase remedial safeguards for plan participants and increase the likelihood of a court finding an arbitrary and capricious act.

II. BACKGROUND

1. ERISA: Legislative Intent at the Time of Creation - 1974

Congress enacted ERISA to protect plan participants and plan beneficiaries who were due benefits but were never paid.<sup>20</sup> ERISA's intent, in part, is to remedy pre-ERISA obstacles that hindered effective enforcement of fiduciary duties and to provide legal and equitable remedies to recover due benefits.<sup>21</sup> To this extent, ERISA's Congressional findings and policy declarations state: "[o]wing to the lack of . . . adequate safeguards concerning their operation, it is desirable in the interests of employees and their beneficiaries . . . that safeguards be provided with respect to the establishment, operation, and administration of such plans . . ." <sup>22</sup> "[T]he policy of [ERISA is] to protect . . . the interests of participants in employee benefit plans and their beneficiaries,

---

<sup>20</sup> Carlton R. Sickles, Introduction: The Significance and Complexity of ERISA, 17 WM. & MARY L. REV. 205 (1975).

<sup>21</sup> H.R. REP. NO. 93-533, at 17 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4655; see also S. REP. NO. 93-127, at 35 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4838, 4871; cf. Emily C. Lechner, "Equitable" Relief Under ERISA: Where the Court's Interpretation Stands and the Need to Redefine its Analysis to Reflect the Trust-Law Basis of ERISA, AMERICAN COLLEGE OF EMPLOYEE BENEFITS COUNSEL, http://www.acebc.com/public-docs/writing-comp-papers/2012 Equitable Relief Under ERISA.pdf (explaining that federal courts are unclear about what about types of remedies fit within the meaning of equitable relief).

<sup>22</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1001(a) (2013).

by . . . providing for appropriate remedies, sanctions, and ready access to the Federal courts.”<sup>23</sup> Congress’s intent in enacting ERISA is clear: “remedy[ing] certain defects in the private retirement system which limit the effectiveness of the system in providing retirement income security.”<sup>24</sup>

Congress is also concerned with the careful balance of setting equitable standards and promoting the expansion of ERISA plans.<sup>25</sup> Congress implemented its objective by erecting preemption provisions,<sup>26</sup> replacing state laws,<sup>27</sup> and providing state and federal venue for claim adjudication.<sup>28</sup> Ultimately, ERISA codifies efforts to protect participants’ and beneficiaries’ rights under qualified<sup>29</sup> ERISA plans.<sup>30</sup>

Throughout ERISA’s general provisions, Congress clearly states that ERISA’s overall theme controls future enactments and guides interpreting courts.<sup>31</sup> Accordingly, ERISA’s overall theme prescribes the careful balance of protecting plan participants and beneficiaries and the promotion of plan creation.<sup>32</sup> Thus, any extension or interpretation of ERISA must carry out its purpose, which fundamentally includes providing adequate remedial protections to plan participants and beneficiaries.<sup>33</sup>

2. ERISA’s Place in Employee Benefits: Statutory Background

The need to protect employees through legislative enactments dates back to the early twentieth century.<sup>34</sup> On the heels of industrialism, employers were managing revenue without regard to their employees’

---

<sup>23</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 6 (quoting H.R. REP. NO. 93-533 (1973)).

<sup>24</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 6 (quoting H.R. REP. NO. 93-533 (1973)).

<sup>25</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 7.

<sup>26</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1144(a).

<sup>27</sup> 29 U.S.C. §§ 1051–61, 1081–86, 1101-14 (1988); H.R. REP. NO. 93–533, at 17 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4655.

<sup>28</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1132.

<sup>29</sup> Qualified status is unique to the I.R.C., which labels a plan as securing preferential tax benefits after satisfying numerous requirements specified by ERISA. 26 U.S.C. § 401 (2014). The Internal Revenue Code of 1986 set specific requirements for employers to qualify for favorable tax treatment to the employer and plan participants. See I.R.C. § 401(a) (2013) (setting design and operational requirements for a 401(k) to meet the qualification requirements).

<sup>30</sup> S. REP. NO. 93-127, at 35 (1973) reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4838, 4871; H.R. REP. NO. 93-533, at 17 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639.

<sup>31</sup> Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, P.L. No. 93-406, 88 Stat 829 (1974) (codified as amended at various sections of Titles 26 and 29 of the United States Code).

<sup>32</sup> Id.

<sup>33</sup> Id.

<sup>34</sup> Christopher Carosa, 7 Deadly Sins Every ERISA Fiduciary Must Avoid: The 1st Deadly Sin – “Income Matters,” FIDUCIARY NEWS (May 24, 2011), <http://fiduciarynews.com/2011/05/7-deadly-sins-every-erisa-fiduciary-must-avoid-the-1st-deadly-sin-%E2%80%93-%E2%80%9Cincome-matters%E2%80%9D/>.

future, taking advantage of the fact that the common laborers were generally unaware of retirement planning.<sup>35</sup> As a result, Congress fashioned numerous legislative enactments to promote the creation of retirement plans and to protect employees and their beneficiaries.

In the 1920's, Congress created incentives for companies who established retirement plans by providing tax deductions.<sup>36</sup> In the 1930's, employers disproportionately contributed to the retirement funds of highly compensated employees.<sup>37</sup> Congress enacted the Social Security Act in 1935 to serve as our nation's main and often sole retirement income.<sup>38</sup> Congress enacted the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act in 1958 to increase protection to plan participants and beneficiaries.<sup>39</sup> Throughout 1960's, long vesting requirements and harsh break in service rules negated much needed retirement funds to plan participants.<sup>40</sup> Congress finally enacted ERISA in 1974.<sup>41</sup> As a body of employee benefits law, ERISA arose from two distinct federal statutes: 1) Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974;<sup>42</sup> and 2) the Internal Revenue Code of 1986.<sup>43</sup> Three different federal statutes, vested within three different federal departments are bestowed with enforcement responsibilities. Namely, the Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act ("WPPDA"),<sup>44</sup> the Labor Management Relations Act ("LMRA"),<sup>45</sup> and Internal Revenue Code of 1954 ("IRC")<sup>46</sup> each serve an important enforcement function. The judiciary, however, serves as the only institution currently able to engage all aspects of ERISA's labyrinth-like provisions.

While Congress has made significant strides to improve workers' retirement interest, federal statutes, however, fail to fully protect employees' retirement interest. The WPPDA regulates private pension systems for purposes of protecting plan participants' rights and benefits.<sup>47</sup> Unfortunately, the WPPDA's scope is limited to disclosure requirements

---

<sup>35</sup> Id.

<sup>36</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 3.

<sup>37</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 3.

<sup>38</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 3.

<sup>39</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 5.

<sup>40</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 5.

<sup>41</sup> Employee Retirement Income Security Act of 1974, Pub. L. No. 93-406, 88 Stat. 829 (1974)(codified as amended at various sections of Titles 26 and 29 of the United States Code).

<sup>42</sup> 29 U.S.C. §§ 1001-1461 (2013).

<sup>43</sup> I.R.C. §§ 1-9833 (2013).

<sup>44</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1031 (2013).

<sup>45</sup> 29 U.S.C. §§ 141-187 (2013).

<sup>46</sup> I.R.C. § 401 (2013).

<sup>47</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1031 (2013).

and therefore lacks substantive fiduciary standards.<sup>48</sup> The WPPDA's main inadequacy is found in its reliance upon the employee's initiative to police and manage his own plan.<sup>49</sup> Moreover, the LMRA provides guidelines to establish and administer jointly operated employer and union plans but fails to establish or provide standards for preserving vested benefits, funding adequacy, investment security, or fiduciary conduct.<sup>50</sup>

Further, the IRC sets rules for a plan to attain "qualified status."<sup>51</sup> Such qualified status grants deductions to the employer when the employer accrues a benefit for the employee.<sup>52</sup> As the IRC's leading function is to prevent evasion of tax obligations and generate revenue, the safeguards set forth by IRC to protect pension are limited.<sup>53</sup> The IRC's limited power includes granting or disallowing qualified status; i.e. the availability of a tax advantage and subsequent tax consequence.<sup>54</sup> ERISA provides several avenues to enforce its provision, such as civil enforcements.<sup>55</sup> ERISA's complex provisions do not stand alone and have lead courts and Congress in need of guidance to reference and often adopt trust law principles.

3. Trust Law in ERISA

At inception, ERISA's complex scheme required adoption of other areas of law to fill in gaps. Congress referred to trust law for guidance in forming remedial provisions and the standards by which courts now review such provisions. Referring to trust law as a guide to inform ERISA, courts have created remedial regimes by utilizing trust law as the default structure.<sup>56</sup> Consequently, courts have continuously resorted to a presumptive dependence on trust principles, even though Congress

---

<sup>48</sup> History of EBSA and ERISA, UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF LABOR, <http://www.dol.gov/ebsa/aboutebsa/history.html> (last visited Apr. 3, 2015).

<sup>49</sup> Robert G. Blakey, Welfare and Pension Plans Disclosure Act Amendments of 1962, 38 NOTRE DAME L. 263 (1963).

<sup>50</sup> 29 U.S.C.S. §§ 185, 141-197 (2013); MEDILL, supra note 4, at 9.

<sup>51</sup> I.R.C. § 401 (2013).

<sup>52</sup> Id.

<sup>53</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 9.

<sup>54</sup> MEDILL, supra note 4, at 9.

<sup>55</sup> 29 U.S.C.S. § 1132(a) (2013) (ERISA sets forth several claims from which civil litigation and civil enforcement actions may arise. A plan participant or beneficiary may bring a claim to recover benefits due under the terms of the plan or to clarify rights for future benefits under the plan. Typically, in a denial of benefits claim, a civil action is brought after the plan's administrator has denied a claim for benefits and the participant or beneficiary has exhausted the plan's administrative appeal procedure).

<sup>56</sup> Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 111 (2008); Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061, 1078 (9th Cir. 2013); Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., 220 F.3d 702, 711 (6th Cir. 2000); Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553, 565 (3d Cir. 1995); John Blair Comm'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, 26 F.3d 360, 369-70 (2d Cir. 1994).

intended trust principles to only be a temporary guide.<sup>57</sup> Several courts have recognized that “[c]ommon law trust principles animate[, but do not control,] the fiduciary responsibility provisions of ERISA.”<sup>58</sup> In enacting ERISA, Congress resorted to trust law to inhibit employer autonomy over employee benefit plans.<sup>59</sup> Trust law supported Congress’ efforts to restrict plan fiduciary and trustee’s powers to alter the standard of review with self-serving language.<sup>60</sup> Altogether, while trust principles continue to influence the courts, ERISA’s remedial scheme ultimately controls an ERISA analysis, and not trust law.

When analyzing ERISA plan interpretation claims, common law trust principles have often been the starting point for courts.<sup>61</sup> Many ERISA fiduciary duty provisions import fiduciary trust principles.<sup>62</sup> Congress, while forming a foundation from which courts could look to, did not propound an exact transposition of common law trust principles into ERISA.<sup>63</sup> Furthermore, the Supreme Court has recognized that “[t]rust law does not tell the entire story. After all, ERISA’s standards and procedural protections partly reflect a congressional determination that the common law of trusts did not offer completely satisfactory protection.”<sup>64</sup> While “ERISA abounds with language and terminology of trust law,” a proliferation of trust law terminology does not mean that trust law is the only or best solution whenever a court tackles an ERISA plan interpretation question.<sup>65</sup> Hence, ERISA was enacted as a regulatory regime while absorbing common law trust principles to guide and not to

---

<sup>57</sup> Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 110–15 (1989) (noting that trust law is the default gapfiller in ERISA interpretation).

<sup>58</sup> Acosta v. Pacific Enter., 950 F.2d 611, 618 (9th Cir. 1991); see also Cent. States v. Cent. Transp., 472 U.S. 559, 570–71 (1985) (noting that trust law should guide the interpretation of ERISA provisions).

<sup>59</sup> John H. Langbein, Trust Law as Regulatory Law: The Unum/Provident Scandal and Judicial Review of Benefit Denials under ERISA, 101 Nw. U.L. Rev. 1315, 1317 (2007).

<sup>60</sup> Id.

<sup>61</sup> Firestone, 489 U.S. at 115; S.REP. NO. 93-127, at 29 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4865; H.R.REP. NO. 93-533, at 11 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4649.

<sup>62</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1)(B) (2000); S.REP. NO. 93-127, at 29 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4865; H.R.REP. NO. 93-533, at 11 (1973), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 4639, 4649.

<sup>63</sup> See Daniel Fischel & John H. Langbein, ERISA’s Fundamental Contradiction: The Exclusive Benefit Rule, 55 U. CHI. L. REV. 1105 (1988) (highlighting Congress’ failure to resolve several persistent inadequacies in ERISA through Congressional amendments to ERISA).

<sup>64</sup> Varity Corp. v. Howe, 516 U.S. 489, 497 (1996).

<sup>65</sup> Firestone, 489 U.S. at 110.

dominate ERISA's purpose.<sup>66</sup> ERISA may and should alter adopted trust principles when necessary.<sup>67</sup>

ERISA fiduciary laws are uniquely premised on the statute's purpose to protect plan participants and promote plan creation, which are different from conventional trust law.<sup>68</sup> ERISA fiduciary duties govern plan administration as well as plan interpretation.<sup>69</sup> Trust law presumes that trustees are disinterested and, generally, lack a personal stake in trust assets, while ERISA fiduciaries are employed and sometimes aligned with the employer or insurance company supplying the insurance benefit.<sup>70</sup> The legislative safeguard arises from ERISA's language, which demands plan fiduciaries to act "solely in the interest of the participants and beneficiaries and . . . for the exclusive purpose of . . . providing benefits to participants and their beneficiaries . . ." <sup>71</sup> But, as a cost-effectiveness measure to promote the creation of plans, ERISA authorizes employers to use "an officer, employee, agent or other representative" as fiduciaries, thus creating an inherent conflict between trust law principles and the practical dynamics of fiduciary plan interpretation.<sup>72</sup>

ERISA binds a plan administrator to act for the sole benefit of the plan participants and beneficiaries, but the employer pays, hires, or fires the plan administrator. The conflict is apparent: an employer or insurance company cannot act without bias on behalf of himself and in the interest of the trust beneficiary.<sup>73</sup> The Supreme Court has distinguished the inherent conflict between a plan administrator's duty to act in the sole benefit of plan participants while being paid by the employer by citing to ERISA's special nature and the careful balance needed to promote plan creation.<sup>74</sup> Specifically, the Supreme Court has stated that an

---

<sup>66</sup> See H.R. REP. NO. 93-1280, at 302 (1974), reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. 5038, 5083 (explaining that, when interpreting fiduciary standards, the purpose of ERISA must control).

<sup>67</sup> Id.

<sup>68</sup> Langbein, supra note 59, at 1326.

<sup>69</sup> See 29 U.S.C. § 1002(21)(A) (2000) (stating that the administration of plan assets and plan interpretation may include interpretation of benefits claim. Granting or denying claimed plan benefits entails the exercise of "discretionary authority" within the meaning of ERISA § 3(21)(A) or 29 U.S.C. § 1002(21)(A) (2000)).

<sup>70</sup> Langbein, supra note 59, at 1326.

<sup>71</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1104(a)(1)(A)(i) (2000).

<sup>72</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1108 (2000); see ERISA §§3(16), 402(a), or 29 U.S.C. §§1002(16), 1102(a) (2000) (making the employer the default plan administrator); ERISA § 402(a)(1), 29 U.S.C. § 1102(a)(1) (2000) (making plan administration a fiduciary function).

<sup>73</sup> George G. Bogert & George T. Bogert, Bogert's Trust and Trustees, in The Law of Trusts and Trustees § 543, at 227 (rev. 2d ed. 1993).

<sup>74</sup> Pegram v. Herdrich, 530 U.S. 211, 225 (2000) (internal quotation marks omitted); Langbein, supra note 59, at 1326.

“[e]mployer[], for example, can be [an] ERISA fiduciar[y] and still take actions to the disadvantage of employee beneficiaries, when they act as employers . . . .”<sup>75</sup> Thus, the Supreme Court reduces liability under one conflict, where the employer pays the plan participant and is acting in the sole interest of the plan and its participants, in order to promote the creation of plans.<sup>76</sup>

Furthermore, other fields aside from ERISA have adopted trust law principles for regulatory purposes.<sup>77</sup> Congress has not fully transplanted trust law principles into other fields without regard to the purpose of such area of law.<sup>78</sup> Accordingly, trust law principles naturally are modified, when applicable, to conform to ERISA’s purpose. It follows then, that Congress’ intent to simultaneously promote the creation of ERISA plans and protect plan participants should modified trust principles to determine when the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply, as identified by the Supreme Court.<sup>79</sup>

4. Arbitrary and Capricious: As Applied to ERISA

The arbitrary and capricious standard derives from pre-ERISA denial of benefits claims under the LMRA.<sup>80</sup> Arbitrary and capricious was the prevailing standard of review of trustee responsibility when ERISA was enacted.<sup>81</sup> Prior to ERISA’s enactment, the LMRA served as a regulator of union-negotiated pension trust administration.<sup>82</sup> The LMRA did not expressly authorize suits brought against individual trustees and fiduciaries.<sup>83</sup> For instance, the courts that apply the arbitrary and capricious standard to review whether a plan provision was structurally defective, which lead to a denial of benefits, does not review the misconduct of the individual administrator.<sup>84</sup>

---

<sup>75</sup> Pegram, 530 U.S. at 225.

<sup>76</sup> Id.

<sup>77</sup> See John H. Langbein, The Secret Life of the Trust: The Trust As an Instrument of Commerce, 107 YALE L.J. 165, 174–77 (1997) (discussing a variety of regulatory compliance trusts in federal and state law).

<sup>78</sup> Id.

<sup>79</sup> Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 512 (2010).

<sup>80</sup> Kevin W. Beatty, A Decade Confusion: The Standard of Review for Erisa Benefit Denial Claims as Established by Firestone, 51 ALA. L. REV. 733, 734–36 (2000).

<sup>81</sup> Id.

<sup>82</sup> Bradley R. Duncan, Litigation Under ERISA: Judicial Review of Fiduciary Claim Denials Under ERISA: An Alternative to the Arbitrary and Capricious Test, 71 CORNELL L. REV. 986, 992 (1986).

<sup>83</sup> Id.

<sup>84</sup> Id. at 992–93.

The arbitrary and capricious standard has evolved from its original adoption.<sup>85</sup> ERISA, while a comprehensive statute, does not specify a standard of review for a court to adopt when analyzing a plan administrator or trustee's actions.<sup>86</sup> Federal common law has evolved numerous legal principles to resolve ambiguities in ERISA's provisions.<sup>87</sup> Consequently, federal courts, by analogy, imported the LMRA arbitrary and capricious standard of review into ERISA's standards.<sup>88</sup> With the adoption of ERISA, Congress included provisions that imposed similar fiduciary duties to those under the LMRA. At the time of ERISA's adoption, however, one key difference set ERISA and LMRA duties and subsequent standard of review apart.<sup>89</sup> While LMRA focuses on the structural defect of plan provisions in union-negotiated plans, ERISA focuses on securing plans "for the sole and exclusive benefit of employees," and thus allows individual review of plan administrators' actions.<sup>90</sup>

As a result of filling ERISA gaps with trust principles, the arbitrary and capricious standard broadens the protective scope of a plan administrator acting under a conflict of interest.<sup>91</sup> The Supreme Court, in Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, rather than finding that a conflict of interest automatically amounts to an arbitrary and capricious act,<sup>92</sup>

---

<sup>85</sup> See Rud v. Liberty Life Assur. Co., 438 F.3d 772 (7th Cir. 2006) (expanding on the sliding scale approach); Van Boxel v. Journal Co. Emps.' Pension Trust., 836 F.2d 1048 (7th Cir. 1987) (pronouncing and applying the sliding scale approach).

<sup>86</sup> 29 U.S.C. § 1132(a) (2012).

<sup>87</sup> See Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506 (2010) (delineating factors a court must consider when analyzing whether a fiduciary's acts are arbitrary and capricious); Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105 (2008) (enumerating factors that warrant consideration in an arbitrary and capricious standard of review).

<sup>88</sup> Michael S. Beaver, The Standard of Review in ERISA Benefits-Denial Cases after Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch: Revolution or Deja vu?, 26 TORT & INS. L.J. 1, 2 (1990); see, e.g., Firestone Tire & Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 108-09 (1989) (stating that "ERISA does not set out the appropriate standard of review for action under § 1132(a)(1)(B) challenging benefit eligibility determinations. To fill this gap, federal courts have adopted the arbitrary and capricious standard developed under . . . 29 USC § 186(c), a provision of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (LMRA).").

<sup>89</sup> Duncan, supra note 82, at 994.

<sup>90</sup> Duncan, supra note 82, at 994.

<sup>91</sup> See Van Boxel, 836 F.2d at 1052 (7th Cir. 1987) (adopting a sliding scale approach that "may be in effect a sliding scale of judicial review of [a] trustees' decisions [-] more penetrating the greater is the suspicion of partiality, less penetrating the smaller that suspicion is.").

<sup>92</sup> Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 145 (1989); see also Kevin W. Beatty, A Decade Confusion: The Standard of Review for Erisa Benefit Denial Claims as Established by Firestone, 51 ALA. L. REV. 733, 733-36 (2000) (explaining that Firestone did not follow the sliding scale approach in Van Boxel. Rather, Van Boxel's sliding scale approach created an analysis that "may be in effect a sliding scale of judicial review of [a] trustees' decisions [-] more penetrating the greater is the suspicion of partiality, less penetrating the smaller that suspicion is." While a conflicted trustee may accorded great deference to plan administrators based on trust principles if the plan accorded such deference upon the plan administrator.<sup>93</sup> Specifically, Firestone referred to the Restatement (Second) of Trusts to confer discretion upon a trustee and his exercise of power.<sup>94</sup> Trust principles provide that a trustee's exercise of power is not subject to a court's control, except to prevent an abuse of discretion.<sup>95</sup> Hence, fusing trust principles and the arbitrary and capricious standard protects a conflict of interest from automatically amounting to an abuse of discretion; the arbitrary and capricious standard, however, does not protect conflict that amount to an abuse of discretion.<sup>96</sup>

With its origins in trust law, the arbitrary and capricious standard has left many unsettled issues for courts to address. While Firestone resolved some issues concerning the application of this standard, it also created questions critical to a resolution of the practical implications of promoting plan creation and protecting plan participants. Scholars have criticized the importation of the LMRA arbitrary and capricious standard of review as applied to ERISA.<sup>97</sup> The LMRA legislation provides safeguards that, for example, require submission of dispute in plan interpretation to an independent arbiter, which ERISA does not have.<sup>98</sup> As a result, scholars have questioned the rationale behind applying a lenient standard of review to an administrator's actions when no inherent safeguards are in place.<sup>99</sup>

III. ERISA'S FEDERAL COMMON LAW: THE SUPREME COURT SETS CONTOURS FOR JUDICIAL REVIEW

The Courts' interpretation of ERISA has imposed several limitations on plan participants and beneficiaries by finding justification in creating uniform sets of laws that encourage employers to establish or sponsor employee benefit plans.<sup>100</sup> The Supreme Court has followed a simplistic approach in fixing an employer-favoring standard of review. In the past receive deference under a Firestone approach, a de novo review is the recommended standard for conflicting administrative decisions.).

---

<sup>93</sup> Firestone, 489 U.S. at 111–13.

<sup>94</sup> Id. (citing RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 187 (2013)).

<sup>95</sup> RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 187 (2013). See generally Brown v. Blue Cross & Blue Shield, Inc., 898 F.2d 1556 (11th Cir. 1990) (explaining how scholars and the courts alike have used abuse of discretion and arbitrary and capricious interchangeably when referring to a deferential standard of review in ERISA cases.).

<sup>96</sup> Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 115 (2008)(explaining that a conflict that arises solely from having an employee trustee administrate the plan does not amount to an abuse of discretion).

<sup>97</sup> Beatty, supra note 80, at 734–36.

<sup>98</sup> Beatty, supra note 80, at 736.

<sup>99</sup> Beatty, supra note 80, at 734–38.

<sup>100</sup> Aetna Health Inc. v. Davila, 542 U.S. 200, 215 (2004).

twenty years, the Supreme Court has addressed the issue of judicial review in the ERISA context.<sup>101</sup> The following section highlights each Supreme Court case and its analysis in fashioning an employer-favoring standard of review.

1. Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch (1989)

Before 1989, ERISA had failed to establish a standard of review for denial of benefits claims.<sup>102</sup> In Firestone, however, the Supreme Court finally addressed the issue of ERISA plan interpretation, establishing the de novo standard of review as the default standard of judicial review in denial of benefit claims.<sup>103</sup> Firestone held that “[c]onsistent with established principles of trust law, . . . a denial of benefits challenged under § 1132(a)(1)(B) is to be reviewed under a de novo standard unless the benefit plan gives the administrator or fiduciary discretionary authority to determine eligibility for benefits or to construe the terms of the plan.”<sup>104</sup> Thus, Firestone is the starting point whenever analyzing an ERISA plan interpretation or judicial standard of review issue.

The Firestone case was a class action by employees who sought severance benefits under one of Firestone Tire and Rubber Company’s ERISA qualified plans.<sup>105</sup> The class action ensued because Firestone Tire and Rubber Company interpreted the plan language to deny the benefit claims, explaining that the reason for the claim did not in fact fall within the meaning of the plan, as they interpreted it.<sup>106</sup>

The Court’s holding was expressly “limited to the appropriate standard of review in § 1132(a)(1)(B) actions challenging denials of benefits based on plan interpretations. [Firestone] express[ed] no view as to the appropriate standard of review for actions under other remedial provisions of ERISA.”<sup>107</sup> The Court did not transplant principles of trust

---

<sup>101</sup> See Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506 (2010)(holding that courts must consider trust law, the plan’s terms at issue, ERISA’s purpose and principles, and the Firestone precedent when determining the applicable standard of review); Glenn, 554 U.S. 105 (holding that the arbitrary and capricious standard of review warrants the consideration of several factors); Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 145 (1989)(holding that the arbitrary and capricious judicial standard of review is required where a plan grants discretionary authority onto a fiduciary in the denial of benefits context).

<sup>102</sup> Firestone, 489 US at 111.

<sup>103</sup> Id. at 105–107 (deciding the meaning of the word “participant” in order to determine who can request plan information when severance benefits are denied under a termination pay plan governed by ERISA).

<sup>104</sup> Id. at 115 (emphasis added).

<sup>105</sup> Id. at 106.

<sup>106</sup> Id.

<sup>107</sup> Firestone, 489 U.S. at 108 (emphasis added).

law.<sup>108</sup> Trust principles simply guided the Court to decide a reviewing standard for a remedial provision of ERISA, not all remedial provisions of ERISA.<sup>109</sup> Therefore, applying an arbitrary and capricious standard did not mean that the plan administrator will prevail on the merits, but only that the plan administrator's interpretation of the plan "will not be disturbed if reasonable."<sup>110</sup>

Thus, Firestone was not primarily concerned with the possibility of reducing protections to plan participants and beneficiaries. The Court's pronouncement provided employers and trustees a means of defeating the heightened de novo standard of review.<sup>111</sup> The Court justified the adoption of the arbitrary and capricious standard of review to trustees who act under the provisions of plan terms granting discretion by resting its analysis on general principles of trust law.<sup>112</sup> The Court's adoption of the arbitrary and capricious standard of review was based on the premise that ERISA was like any other contract, where deference is given to either party's interpretation unless the contract itself redirects such deference to one party.<sup>113</sup>

2. Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn (2008)

In 2008, the Supreme Court in Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn followed Firestone's adoption of a highly deferential standard of review - arbitrary and capricious standard, where a plan grants discretionary authority to the plan administrator.<sup>114</sup> Glenn also added to Firestone's framework by requiring the consideration of external factors, such as the severity of a conflict of interest, when deciding whether an administrator's acts were arbitrary and capricious.<sup>115</sup> The Glenn Court stated that some factors merits consideration even under a deferential standard of review.<sup>116</sup> Glenn did not broaden Firestone's judicial review principles, but rather applied Firestone's underlying trust law principles in order to promote plan participants and beneficiaries' rights under a deferential standard of review in benefit denial cases.

---

<sup>108</sup> Id.

<sup>109</sup> Id.

<sup>110</sup> Id. at 111.

<sup>111</sup> Id. at 113–14.

<sup>112</sup> Id. at 115.

<sup>113</sup> Chad Baruch, The Widening Gyre: The Illusory Promise of Meaningful Judicial Review of ERISA Benefit Denials in the Fifth Circuit, 25 S.U. L. REV. 99, 112 (1997).

<sup>114</sup> Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 109–10 (2008).

<sup>115</sup> Id. at 110.

<sup>116</sup> Id. at 115.

In Glenn, the petitioner served as an administrator and insurer of an ERISA-governed long-term disability insurance plan.<sup>117</sup> The petitioner, as administrator, had discretionary authority to determine employees' benefit claims and, as an insurer, funded payments for approved benefit claims.<sup>118</sup> An employee and plan participant, with a governmentally certified disability, was denied plan disability benefits.<sup>119</sup> Even though the Social Security Administration granted her permanent disability, the administrator denied her claim for plan disability payments because the standard enumerated by the plan was stricter than the Social Security Administration's definition.<sup>120</sup>

The Court determined two issues: 1) whether a conflict of interest exists when a plan administrator both evaluates a benefits claim and pays for such claim; and 2) whether any such conflict of interest influences the "judicial review of a discretionary benefit determination."<sup>121</sup> Glenn held that a conflict of interest may exist when the plan is responsible for both determining whether a valid benefit claims exist and paying the claim.<sup>122</sup> The Court identified "that this dual role creates a conflict of interest . . . [and that] conflicts are but one factor among many that a reviewing judge must take into account."<sup>123</sup>

The Court did not want to abandon Firestone.<sup>124</sup> No change, but an addition, to the deferential standard of review was made.<sup>125</sup> Trust law was, again, the fundamental premise for keeping to high level of deference.<sup>126</sup> Glenn, while citing to the Restatement of Trusts, reasoned that a conflicted trustee's claim determination does not switch the standard back to de novo review, but required that a reviewing judge take "account of the conflict when determining [] whether [a] trustee, substantively or procedurally, has abused his discretion."<sup>127</sup> An arbitrary and capricious analysis based on a conflict of interest is fact sensitive. Specifically, a conflict may exist, but a court will consider the extent of that conflict as one factor in determining whether the trustee abused his discretion. Even when a conflict of interest is present, a deferential standard is warranted when the plan grants discretion to the trustee.<sup>128</sup>

---

<sup>117</sup> Id. at 108.

<sup>118</sup> Id.

<sup>119</sup> Id. at 109.

<sup>120</sup> Glenn, 554 U.S. at 109.

<sup>121</sup> Id. at 110.

<sup>122</sup> Id. at 108, 114.

<sup>123</sup> Id. at 108, 116.

<sup>124</sup> Id. at 116.

<sup>125</sup> Id. at 115.

<sup>126</sup> Glenn, 554 U.S. at 115.

<sup>127</sup> Id.

<sup>128</sup> Id. at 116-17 (internal quotation marks omitted).

In addition, other factors may be considered to determine whether a trustee has abused his discretion.<sup>129</sup> While a conflict of interest was considered one factor, it was not the only one the court would consider.<sup>130</sup> Analogizing to administrative law judges, who take account of case-specific factors to determine liability, Glenn appoints judges with the ultimate task of weighing all factors together.<sup>131</sup>

Adding procedural rules to combat inadequacies in internal plan review of benefits denials was not an option for the Court due to a concern of added complexity, time, and expense on the court system and plan participants.<sup>132</sup> The Court emphasized that “[b]enefits decisions arise in too many contexts, concern too many circumstances, and can relate in too many different ways to conflicts . . . for us to come up with a one-size-fits-all procedural system that is likely to promote fair and accurate review.”<sup>133</sup> The Court further reasoned that Congress did not intend for the court to review the “lion’s share of ERISA plan claims denials . . . [for if] Congress intended such a system of review, . . . it would not have left to the courts the development of review standards but would have said more on the subject.”<sup>134</sup>

Accordingly, Glenn creates a method for courts to decide, after considering external factors, whether a judicial standard of review should revert back to de novo when the plan enumerates discretionary authority upon the trustee. After Glenn, courts consider numerous factors, such as a conflict of interest, when deciding whether a plan administrator’s actions are arbitrary and capricious.<sup>135</sup> Glenn did not, however, enumerate the other numerous factors it approves for consideration. Nonetheless, the implications of such judicial navigation results in an amplified investigation of the facts in any given ERISA case that grants discretion upon the plan administrator. Therefore, instead of narrowly focusing on the four corners of the document, a court may widen its evidentiary horizon, which increases the possibility of finding that a plan administrator’s actions were arbitrary and capricious.

3. Conkright v. Frommert (2010)

In 2010, the Supreme Court, in Conkright v. Frommert, addressed whether a plan administrator’s second decision warranted deference after

---

<sup>129</sup> Id. at 117.

<sup>130</sup> Id.

<sup>131</sup> Id.

<sup>132</sup> Glenn, 554 U.S. at 116–17.

<sup>133</sup> Id. at 116.

<sup>134</sup> Id. (citing Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 109 (1989)).

<sup>135</sup> Grams v. Am. Med. Instruments Holdings Long Term Disability Plan, 2009 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 89455, 6–7 (M.D. Fla. 2009).

the first decision was considered unreasonable in the denial of benefits context.<sup>136</sup> Conkright held that a single honest mistake in ERISA plan administration did not warrant a stricter standard of review.<sup>137</sup> In other words, a single honest mistake, alone, does not warrant a de novo review when the plan grants discretionary authority up the plan administrator.<sup>138</sup>

Conkright follows Firestone's pronouncement of trust law as a guide to answer the ERISA standard of review questions.<sup>139</sup> The Court announced, from integrating Firestone and Glenn, four elements to determine the proper standard of review in future ERISA judicial review cases.<sup>140</sup> Namely, future courts would consider trust law, the plan's terms at issue, ERISA's purposes and principles, and the Firestone precedent.<sup>141</sup>

Conkright entailed a corporation's employees who left the corporation and received a lump-sum retirement benefit distribution, and then were later rehired.<sup>142</sup> The plan administrators used a "phantom accounting" method to eliminate double retirement payments.<sup>143</sup> The plan administrator then proposed another accounting method that did not calculate the present value of past distributions but instead used a fixed interest rate from the time of the distribution that accounted for the time value of money.<sup>144</sup> A class of employees filed suit after their employer denied benefits based on the change in calculating methods.<sup>145</sup> The Conkright Court recognized that the plan administrator's initial choice in an inherently restrictive accounting method to the detriment of the plan participants was unreasonable.<sup>146</sup> But the administrator's decision was nonetheless labeled as an "honest mistake."<sup>147</sup> The Conkright Court reasoned, referring to its pronouncement in Glenn, that ERISA disfavors rules that create further complexity.<sup>148</sup> The Court ultimately held that if a conflict of interest would "not strip a plan administrator of deference, it is difficult to see why a single honest mistake would require a different result."<sup>149</sup>

---

<sup>136</sup> Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 510–11 (2010)(addressed how to account for respondent's past distribution in calculating current benefits to avoid paying the same benefit twice).

<sup>137</sup> Id. at 509.

<sup>138</sup> Id.

<sup>139</sup> Id. at 512.

<sup>140</sup> Id.

<sup>141</sup> Id. at 513.

<sup>142</sup> Conkright, 559 U.S. at 510.

<sup>143</sup> Id.

<sup>144</sup> Id. at 510-11.

<sup>145</sup> Id.

<sup>146</sup> Id. at 513.

<sup>147</sup> Id.

<sup>148</sup> Conkright, 559 U.S. at 519.

<sup>149</sup> Id. at 513 (internal quotation marks omitted).

On remand from the Supreme Court, the Second Circuit in the Western District of New York held that the plan administrator's honest mistake was reasonable and thus not arbitrary and capricious.<sup>150</sup> The Second Circuit Court of Appeals reversed the District Court's decision after applying Firestone deference and explained that the plan administrator's plan interpretation, while labeled an honest mistake, was unreasonable and thus arbitrary and capricious because the administrator's plan interpretation was inconsistent with the plan language.<sup>151</sup> The Second Circuit Court of Appeals further noted that, even under a de novo review, the plan administrator's honest mistake was unreasonable and thus arbitrary and capricious because it violated another ERISA provision.<sup>152</sup> Therefore, while an honest mistake does not strip an administrator of his Firestone deference, if such mistake is unreasonable, either through violating another ERISA provision or an irrational plan interpretation, the administrator's act will be considered arbitrary and capricious.

i. Breyer's Dissent and Accompanying Scholars

Justice Breyer, dissenting in Conkright, partially accepted Firestone's holding while concerned with the majority's unprecedented and erroneous conclusion of interpreting trust law in such an inflexible manner.<sup>153</sup> Justice Breyer highlighted that the majority recognized trust law did "not resolve the specific issue before the Court."<sup>154</sup> Nonetheless, while having the opportunity to reference another body of law or to interpret trust law in such a manner to promote plan participants' and beneficiaries' interest, the Court fashioned a rule that required deference to a plan administrator's second attempt at interpreting plan documents when he was found to have abused his discretion the first time he interpreted them.<sup>155</sup>

Consistent with Justice Breyer's intuition and reasoning, scholars have noted that Conkright, while claiming to base its decision on trust principles, failed to consider fundamental trust principles inconsistent with the analysis leading to Conkright's holding.<sup>156</sup> Trust law requires the

---

<sup>150</sup> Paul Mollica, Frommert v. Conkright, EMPLOYMENT LAW BLOG (Dec. 26, 2013), <http://www.employmentlawblog.info/2013/12/frommert-v-conkright-no-12-67-2d-cir-dec-23-2013.shtml>.

<sup>151</sup> Frommert v. Conkright, 738 F.3d 522, 531 (2nd Cir. 2013).

<sup>152</sup> Id. at 531.

<sup>153</sup> Id. at 528–29 (Breyer, S., dissenting).

<sup>154</sup> Id. at 529 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

<sup>155</sup> Id. at 528–29 (Breyer, J., dissenting).

<sup>156</sup> Id. (Breyer, J., dissenting); see also Langbein, supra note 59, at 1335–36 (explaining that key fundamental differences between ERISA's purpose and trust law require a more divestment of deference to a trustee when discretion is not exercised honestly and without bias.<sup>157</sup> A trustee may exercise his discretion with bias by making multiple erroneous interpretations, even if in good faith.<sup>158</sup> Not only bad faith, but also a plan administrator's incompetence, can serve as sufficient reason to divest him of deference under trust principles.<sup>159</sup>

Conkright reasons that ERISA's purpose far outweighs the addition of further complexity to protect plan participants because a careful balance must be maintained to protect plan creation.<sup>160</sup> Justice Breyer emphasized that preserving the reasons on which ERISA is based – in part, the enlargement and protection of plan participants' and beneficiaries' rights, are important to implement ERISA's purpose.<sup>161</sup> Building on principles to promote the interest of efficiency, uniformity, and reduced litigation cost, while noting the careful balance courts have striven to strike between ensuring unbiased and prompt enforcement of rights and the encouragement of creating plans, the Court, however, justifies its pronouncement of broad deference to administrators on one side of the balance – promoting efficiency, predictability, and uniformity.<sup>162</sup>

IV. THE SPLIT

Since Firestone, the Second, Third, Sixth, and Ninth Circuits have disagreed on the extent to which the arbitrary and capricious standard applies to plan interpretation outside of the denial of benefits context.<sup>163</sup> On opposite sides of the Firestone spectrum sits Tibble v. Edison International of the Ninth Circuit and John Blair Commc 'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group of the Second Circuit.<sup>164</sup> flexible and causal adoption of trust principles and other legal bodies of law to guide ERISA instead of a inflexible default adoption of trust principles).

---

<sup>157</sup> Jessica M. Standish, Michael D. Reilly & Jeffrey L. Gingold, CONFRONTING BANS ON DISCRETIONARY CLAUSES IN ERISA PLANS, 191, 199, available at http://www.erisapro.com/pdfs/12\_Standish.pdf (last visited May 5, 2015).

<sup>158</sup> Id.

<sup>159</sup> See Langbein, supra note 59, at 1317.

<sup>160</sup> Conkright, 559 U.S. at 517.

<sup>161</sup> Id. at 528–29 (Breyer, S., dissenting).

<sup>162</sup> Id. at 518.

<sup>163</sup> See Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2013) (allowing the broad application of the arbitrary and capricious to apply to all plan interpretation); Hunter v. Caliber System, Inc., 220 F.3d 702 (6th Cir. 2000) (noting that the arbitrary and capricious standard applied outside the denial of benefits context); Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1995) (applying the arbitrary and capricious to the breach of fiduciary context); John Blair Communications, Inc. Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group, Inc. Profit Sharing Plan, 26 F.3d 360 (2d Cir. 1994) (explaining that Firestone clearly disallows the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard outside the denial of benefits context).

<sup>164</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d 1061; John Blair, 26 F.3d 360.

Each of the abovereferenced circuits hold a distinct perspective composing a collage-like jurisprudence. John Blair adopts a strict reading of Firestone and applies the arbitrary and capricious standard to denial of benefits claims only.<sup>165</sup> At the opposite end, Tibble proposes an arbitrary and capricious standard of review for all remedial ERISA provisions and any other plan interpretation provisions.<sup>166</sup> The Third and Sixth Circuits agree that an arbitrary and capricious standard should apply outside of the denial of benefits context, but reject the extreme positions of the Ninth and Second Circuits.<sup>167</sup> The Third and Sixth Circuits do not define how far the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply outside of the denial of benefits context.<sup>168</sup> Thus, broadly categorized, the Ninth and Second Circuits sit at opposite sides while the Sixth and Third Circuits sit somewhere in between the Ninth and Second Circuits.

1. Strict Construction: The Arbitrary and Capricious Standard Does Not Apply to All Plan Interpretation Claims Outside of the Denial of Benefits Context.

i. Second Circuit - John Blair Commc'n Profit Sharing Plan v. Telemundo Group and Frommert v. Conkright.

The Second Circuit, in John Blair, decided whether the arbitrary and capricious standard applies outside of the denial of benefits context.<sup>169</sup> The court held that the arbitrary and capricious standard does not apply outside the benefits denial context.<sup>170</sup> It is important to note, however, that John Blair was the first case decided after Firestone that faithfully followed Firestone's limited standing. Since Firestone, the Second Circuit has continued to uphold John Blair's legacy, while the Supreme Court has decided two cases speaking, in part, to judicial standard of review in ERISA claims on plan interpretation.<sup>171</sup>

John Blair involved a suit by the John Blair company plan (JBCP) and its members against another plan, the Telemundo plan (TP), as a

---

<sup>165</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369–70.

<sup>166</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1077.

<sup>167</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711; Moench, 62 F.3d at 565–66.

<sup>168</sup> See Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711 (applying arbitrary and capricious standard outside the denial of benefits context but not stating how far it should be applied); Moench, 62 F.3d at 565–66 (applying arbitrary and capricious standard to fiduciary breaches but not stating what other context warrant the arbitrary and capricious analysis).

<sup>169</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369–70.

<sup>170</sup> Id. (emphasis added).

<sup>171</sup> Conkright arose from the 2nd Circuit. The Supreme Court held that the 2nd Circuit's carving exception to ERISA's remedial provisions would not be affirmed in that instance. But, the Supreme Court did not repudiate John Blair in Conkright. Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 512–14 (2010).

committee and individual members of the committee.<sup>172</sup> The JBCP was reorganized to include new members and funds from another plan.<sup>173</sup> The process entailed transferring assets from a plan that was reorganized into the JBCP.<sup>174</sup> During the re-organization of the JBCP, TP transferred assets from the reorganized plan into JBCP but failed to transfer the appreciation of those assets.<sup>175</sup> As a result, JBCP claimed that TP violated its fiduciary duty.

In declining to apply the arbitrary and capricious standard outside of the denial of benefits context, John Blair kept to Firestone's pronouncement – the arbitrary and capricious standard, in Firestone, only applied to the denial of benefits context.<sup>176</sup> The Second Circuit strictly construed Firestone's holding.<sup>177</sup> John Blair justified its narrow interpretation of Firestone on the same idea identified in Moench v. Robertson.<sup>178</sup> A Third Circuit case weighing in on the split discussed below in Section III explains that all ERISA remedial actions are not the same, and as such, all ERISA remedial actions should not utilize the same standard of judicial review.<sup>179</sup> In addition, John Blair justifies its holding by identifying that Firestone concerned a denial of benefits case and did not speak to other ERISA remedial actions where the plan grants interpretative powers upon the plan administrator.<sup>180</sup>

Moreover, the Second Circuit, on remand from the Supreme Court, in Frommert v. Conkright, continues to uphold the John Blair legacy.<sup>181</sup> In Frommert, on appeal, the plaintiffs brought two claims: that the plan administrator plan interpretation 1) was an unreasonable interpretation under a denial of benefits claim, and 2) violated an ERISA notice provision.<sup>182</sup> Frommert explicitly declined to address what standard of review applied outside the denial of benefits context. Specifically, Frommert stated that determining whether an ERISA notice violation stemming from an “interpretation of the [plan] . . . , is subject to review under a de novo or abuse of discretion standard. We decline to answer

---

<sup>172</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 362.

<sup>173</sup> Id. at 362-63.

<sup>174</sup> Id.

<sup>175</sup> Id.

<sup>176</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369; see Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 111 (1989)(explaining that the de novo standard of review was the default standard except in the denial of benefits context where a plan granted interpretative authority upon the plan administrator).

<sup>177</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369.

<sup>178</sup> Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553 (3d Cir. 1995).

<sup>179</sup> Id. at 565.

<sup>180</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369.

<sup>181</sup> Frommert v. Conkright, 738 F.3d 522, 531 (2d Cir. 2013).

<sup>182</sup> Id. at 525.

that question here . . . .”<sup>183</sup> The Frommert decision recaptures the Second Circuit’s stance on determining the standard of review for plan interpretation that are beyond the denial of benefits context. In conclusion, John Blair and Frommert stand for the proposition that Firestone deference applies to denial of benefit claims and that any other claim outside of the denial of benefits context requires a higher court’s review to determine the appropriate standard of review.<sup>184</sup>

2. Liberal Construction: The Arbitrary and Capricious Standard Applies Outside of the Denial of Benefits Context.

i. Ninth Circuit - Tibble v. Edison Int’l (2013)

The Ninth Circuit, in Tibble, decided to what extent the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply to a plan administrator or trustee’s plan interpretation outside of the benefit claims context.<sup>185</sup> Broadly interpreting Firestone and its progeny, Tibble held that a high deferential standard of review applied to all plan interpretations beyond denial of benefit claims.<sup>186</sup> Under this analysis, the Tibble court applied Firestone deference in evaluating a plan administrator’s alleged breach of fiduciary duty.<sup>187</sup>

The facts of Tibble entailed a suit by beneficiaries against the employer’s benefit plan administrator for allegedly managing the plan imprudently in a self-interested fashion.<sup>188</sup> The employer provided six investment options in the defined contribution plan,<sup>189</sup> which entitled retirees only to the value of their own investment accounts.<sup>190</sup> Among the other financial options to choose from, the company had retail-class mutual funds, which had higher administrative fees than alternatives available only to institutional investors.<sup>191</sup> Further, the addition of a wider array of mutual funds also introduced a practice known as revenue sharing into the mix.<sup>192</sup> Under this dynamic, certain mutual funds collected fees out of fund assets and disbursed them to the plan’s service provider.<sup>193</sup> The employer, Edison, in turn received a credit on its invoices from that

---

<sup>183</sup> Id. at 531.

<sup>184</sup> See Frommert, 738 F.3d at 522; John Blair, 26 F.3d at 360.

<sup>185</sup> Tibble v. Edison Int’l, 711 F.3d 1061, 1077 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>186</sup> Id.

<sup>187</sup> Id.

<sup>188</sup> Id. at 1066.

<sup>189</sup> See 29 U.S.C. § 1002(34) (2013).

<sup>190</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1067.

<sup>191</sup> Id.

<sup>192</sup> Id.

<sup>193</sup> Id.

provider.<sup>194</sup> Beneficiaries objected to the inclusion of retail-class mutual funds, specifically claiming that their inclusion had been imprudent, and that the practice of revenue sharing had violated both the plan document and conflict of interest provision.<sup>195</sup> The beneficiaries also claimed that offering unitized stock funds, money market-style investments, and mutual funds were imprudent.<sup>196</sup>

The plan document stated that the company would pay the administrative cost.<sup>197</sup> By providing more investment options to the beneficiaries, the plan became more expensive to administer and Edison availed itself of revenue sharing with the third party administrator of investment options for the plan.<sup>198</sup> Under the agreement, the mutual fund would transfer a portion of their fees to the plan's third party service provider's account.<sup>199</sup> The revenue would reimburse the third party service provider, thus Edison would receive a credit on its bill from the third party servicer.<sup>200</sup> Plan administrators later amended the plan to include discretionary authority to interpret the plan's language, and the Tibble court addressed the interpretive issues of whether the pre-amendment version of the plan allowed offsets or revenue sharing.<sup>201</sup>

Tibble found three main reasons for holding that Firestone deference applies beyond plan interpretation in benefit denial claims and to fiduciary duties.<sup>202</sup> In identifying and distinguishing the current split on the scope of deferential review, first, the Tibble court distinguished John Blair, which holds that Firestone deference is generally limited to denial of benefit claims.<sup>203</sup> Next, Tibble reasoned that trust law dictates the appropriate standard of review.<sup>204</sup> Lastly, Tibble reasons that its "across-the-board" deference derives from Conkright's emphasis on promoting plan creation.<sup>205</sup>

Tibble identified strong parallels between Conkright and John Blair.<sup>206</sup> The Conkright decision arose from the Second Circuit, from which the decision in John Blair originated. While the Conkright court did not expressly repudiate John Blair's holding, it nonetheless reasoned

---

<sup>194</sup> Id.

<sup>195</sup> Id. at 1065, 1076.

<sup>196</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1067.

<sup>197</sup> Id.

<sup>198</sup> Id. at 1076.

<sup>199</sup> Id.

<sup>200</sup> Id.

<sup>201</sup> Id.

<sup>202</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1077.

<sup>203</sup> Id.; John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369–70.

<sup>204</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1078.

<sup>205</sup> Id.

<sup>206</sup> Id. at 1077.

that exceptions to ERISA were disfavored.<sup>207</sup> Conkright repudiated the Second Circuit's exception to Firestone deference by forgiving a first-time good-faith mistake by a plan administrator or trustee.<sup>208</sup> Therefore, Tibble reasoned that anything resembling a carved-out exception to ERISA deferential review is unwarranted.<sup>209</sup>

Second, Tibble reasoned that trust law controls the analysis in deciding the standard of judicial review.<sup>210</sup> While acknowledging that Firestone's holding was limited to denial of benefit claims and no other ERISA remedial provisions, the Tibble court noted that trust law was a founding principle in Firestone's analysis.<sup>211</sup> Thus, using trust principles, which Firestone found appropriate solely for its denial of benefit claims analysis, Tibble presumed that trust law is the appropriate body of law to control the standard of review for any and all plan interpretation concerning ERISA.<sup>212</sup>

Lastly, Tibble justified its "across-the-board" deference by identifying Conkright's emphasis on the careful balance between promoting plan creation and protecting plan participant's rights.<sup>213</sup> Following the spirit of Conkright, Tibble was likewise more concerned with one side of the balance — promoting efficiency, predictability, and uniformity to encourage the creation of ERISA plans.<sup>214</sup> Like Conkright, therefore, Tibble completely disregarded the equitable standards that ensure unbiased and prompt enforcement of plan participants' and beneficiary rights — the other side of the balance.<sup>215</sup>

ii. Sixth Circuit - Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc. (2000)

The Sixth Circuit, in Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., decided whether the lower court erred by applying the arbitrary and capricious standard to a plan administrator plan interpretation outside of the denial of benefit claims context.<sup>216</sup> Similar to Moench v. Robertson, Hunter held that the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard applied beyond the typical review of denial of benefits claims.<sup>217</sup> In holding that the district

---

<sup>207</sup> Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 513 (2010).

<sup>208</sup> Id.

<sup>209</sup> Id. at 1078

<sup>210</sup> Id.

<sup>211</sup> Id. at 1076-77.

<sup>212</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1078.

<sup>213</sup> Id.

<sup>214</sup> Id.

<sup>215</sup> Id.

<sup>216</sup> Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., 220 F.3d 702, 711 (6th Cir. 2000).

<sup>217</sup> Id. at 710.

court did not err in using the arbitrary and capricious standard of review, Hunter based its decision on Firestone and trust law principles.<sup>218</sup>

Hunter involved a suit by plan participants who claimed that the plan administrator failed to perform several fiduciary duties.<sup>219</sup> Plan participants were denied lump sum distributions and delayed the opportunity to sell company stock after a spin-off from defendant's parent company occurred.<sup>220</sup> An amendment to the plan was made. The amendment created a fiction - that plan participants' employment continued during the spin-off period of the subsidiary company from the parent, when in-fact they were not.<sup>221</sup> The court affirmed in favor of the plan administrators under an arbitrary and capricious standard of review.<sup>222</sup>

While acknowledging that the wholesale importation of trust principles into ERISA is unwarranted, Hunter announced that the arbitrary and capricious standard is appropriate outside the denial of benefits context.<sup>223</sup> The Sixth Circuit added that its circuit precedent, as consistent with Firestone, required an inquiry of whether the plan administrator's interpretation was arbitrary and capricious, made in bad faith, or otherwise contrary to law.<sup>224</sup> Hunter recognized that Firestone stood for the limited premise that the standard of review for denial of benefit claims, and not any other remedial ERISA provision, is arbitrary and capricious when the plan grants discretion upon the trustee or plan administrator.<sup>225</sup> Nonetheless, the Hunter court modeled its analysis after Firestone and Moench and based its decision to apply the arbitrary and capricious standard outside the benefits claims context on language and principles of trust law.<sup>226</sup> Hunter is different from Tibble's expansive position because Hunter did not state the extent to which the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply outside the denial of benefits context.<sup>227</sup> Thus, Hunter stands for the proposition that the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply outside of the denial of benefits context but exactly how far from the denial of benefits context is unclear.<sup>228</sup>

---

<sup>218</sup> Id. at 709–710.

<sup>219</sup> Id. at 706.

<sup>220</sup> Id.

<sup>221</sup> Id. at 707.

<sup>222</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 707.

<sup>223</sup> Id. at 710.

<sup>224</sup> Id.

<sup>225</sup> Id. at 711.

<sup>226</sup> Id. at 711–12.

<sup>227</sup> Id.

<sup>228</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711–12.

iii. Third Circuit - Moench v. Robertson (1995)

The Third Circuit, in Moench v. Robertson, considered whether a breach of fiduciary duty claim warranted an arbitrary and capricious standard of review.<sup>229</sup> Specifically, Moench considered the extent to which fiduciaries of an Employee Stock Option Plan (ESOP) may be liable when investing solely in the employer's common stock and when the plan terms provide that the primary purpose of the ESOP is to invest in employer's stock.<sup>230</sup> The subsidiary and accompanying issue was whether a breach of fiduciary duty claim warranted an arbitrary and capricious standard of review.<sup>231</sup> Moench held that while the arbitrary and capricious standard should not be mechanically applied to all ERISA claims, Firestone's mode of analysis and reference to trust law warrants the application of the arbitrary and capricious standard in breach of fiduciary claims.<sup>232</sup>

Moench involved a bank holding company that established an ESOP for its employees.<sup>233</sup> Throughout a three-year period, the bank's common stock fell approximately 95%.<sup>234</sup> Federal regulatory agencies expressed their concern over the bank's financial stability, but the plan administrator continued to invest in the ESOP.<sup>235</sup> The bank ultimately filed for bankruptcy.<sup>236</sup> Former bank employees who participated in the ESOP brought suit against the bank committee, while not suing the plan trustee nor the plan sponsor, who was the bank.<sup>237</sup>

Moench, as in Hunter and Tibble, recognized that Firestone's holding was limited to the applicable standard of review under denial of benefits claims and not other remedial measures under ERISA.<sup>238</sup> The Moench court justified its holding on Firestone's dependence on trust principles.<sup>239</sup> Firestone's analysis, while limited to benefit claims, was pertinent to all claims challenging a fiduciaries performance under ERISA.<sup>240</sup> Moench further explained that Congress's intent to invoke trust law as a guide to ERISA is consistent with its decision because they do

---

<sup>229</sup> Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553, 556–57 (3d Cir. 1995).

<sup>230</sup> Id.

<sup>231</sup> Id.

<sup>232</sup> Id. at 565.

<sup>233</sup> Id. at 557.

<sup>234</sup> Id.

<sup>235</sup> Moench, 62 F.3d at 559–60.

<sup>236</sup> Id.

<sup>237</sup> Id. at 559.

<sup>238</sup> Id. at 565–67.

<sup>239</sup> Id.

<sup>240</sup> Id.

not pronounce that every remedial ERISA provision warrants an arbitrary and capricious review.<sup>241</sup>

Therefore, the Moench court's perspective was that denial of benefit claims, breach of fiduciary duty claims, and possibly other remedial claims, but not all ERISA remedial claims, warranted a deferential standard of review.<sup>242</sup> While Tibble holds that the arbitrary and capricious standard applies without limits to any and all plan interpretation where the plan grants discretion, Moench holds that some but not all instances of plan interpretation warrants an arbitrary and capricious standard.<sup>243</sup> Moench suggests that certain facts, but not all facts, warrant an arbitrary and capricious standard of review where a plan grants discretion.<sup>244</sup> The Moench court reasoned that the arbitrary and capricious standard of review cannot simply apply to all ERISA remedial claims because each are comprised of dissimilar facts and circumstances that may require another standard of review.<sup>245</sup> Thus, by inference, one can interpret Moench to mean that all ERISA remedial claims are not the same and those claims that are similar in fact and circumstance, like a denial of benefit claim, warrant one type of standard for judicial review, but not one standard should apply to all ERISA remedial claims.

V. ANALYSIS

The inconsistency among the circuits creates serious practical implications for ERISA civil cases. The retirement pensions system, and how courts interpret ERISA, has an impact on 1) how we save; 2) the fluctuation of our capital markets; and, among others 3) governmental responsibility through social security — fundamental elements of our nation's financial security. The standard of judicial review and how courts evaluate whether a violation of an ERISA remedial provision has occurred implicates an outcome determinative analysis. The Ninth Circuit has decided that any and all plan interpretation, beyond denial of benefits claims, should be accorded Firestone deference if granted by the plan.

Plan interpretation includes a myriad of plan administrative duties with varying degrees of implications on the plan participant and beneficiary. For example, the area of plan interpretation includes: 1) denial of benefits claim; 2) the implementation of administrative rules to the plan and what can and cannot be added by the administrator; 3)

---

<sup>241</sup> Moench, 62 F.3d. at 565–66.

<sup>242</sup> Id.

<sup>243</sup> Id.

<sup>244</sup> Id.

<sup>245</sup> Id.

determining what is adequate notice to plan participants;<sup>246</sup> 4) the scope of plan administrators' fact determination in any such claim under the plan; 5) the scope of medical determinations; 6) determining who is a plan beneficiary when a state does not legally recognize same-sex marriage; 7) setting the scope of fiduciary liability; 8) interpreting what formula will control the benefit calculation;<sup>247</sup> and 9) interpreting benefit waivers.<sup>248</sup>

ERISA explains that a court's interpretation must carry out its purpose – to protect plan participants and beneficiaries and promote plan creation. This comment posits a solution to keep the careful balance between participant protection and plan promotion. While this comment agrees with one aspect of the Ninth Circuit — that all plan interpretation should be accorded Firestone deference if the plan provides discretion — this comment does not adopt the Second Circuit's restrictive reading of Firestone. Instead, reflecting the current judicial trend in upholding deference for plan administrators when the plan grants discretion, this Comment recommends that a court be required to adopt broader remedial safeguards increasing the scope of evidentiary review by analyzing any and all relevant factors that may capture and demonstrate an arbitrary and capricious act.

1. Weighing in on the Split

The Sixth and Third Circuits' holdings reflect the model for added remedial safeguards that heighten the likelihood of finding an arbitrary and capricious act while sustaining the careful balance between plan creation and plan participant protection.<sup>249</sup> The Ninth Circuit covers plan administrators with a protective veil concerning any and all plan interpretation, so long as the plan grants discretion, without regard to the rights and interest of plan participants and beneficiaries.<sup>250</sup> The Second Circuit takes a strict constructionist approach refusing to expand the arbitrary and capricious standard reducing judicial economy.<sup>251</sup>

---

<sup>246</sup> See Frommert v. Conkright, 738 F.3d 522 (2nd Cir. 2013).

<sup>247</sup> Ogletree Deakins, High Court Rules ERISA Plan Administrator's Interpretation is Entitled to Deference, NATIONAL EAUTHORITY (Apr. 21, 2010), <http://www.shrm.org/hrdisciplines/benefits/articles/pages/erisaruling.aspx>.

<sup>248</sup> Jeffrey M. Gorris, Waivers of ERISA Plan Benefits: Preventing Judicial Interpretations Of A Complex Statute From Frustrating The Statute's Simple Purpose, 155 U. PA. L. REV. 717, 734-35 (2007).

<sup>249</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711-12 (6th Cir. 2000); Moench, 62 F.3d at 565-66 (3d Cir. 1995).

<sup>250</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1077 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>251</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369 (2nd Cir. 1994).

The Second Circuit has failed to recognize that an analytical skeleton is necessary to encompass other remedial provisions.<sup>252</sup> By rigidly construing Firestone's language to apply to the denial of benefits context only, the Second Circuit suggest that each and every plan interpretation provision in ERISA, if not already considered by the court, should be considered individually to determine which standard of review should apply.<sup>253</sup> Courts would be burdened if they had to consider all cases of plan interpretation individually and delineate a rule for each in deciding which standard of review applies. Such result would contradict ERISA's purpose which seeks to add simplicity to the judicial avenues created by ERISA in an effort to promote plan creation. Therefore, under the Second Circuit's approach, courts would be flooded with the responsibility of deciding which standard of judicial review applies to each and every instance of ERISA plan interpretation, increasing litigation and adding complexity to the administration of ERISA plans.

The Second Circuit recognizes implications of an across-the-board deference approach. In both John Blair and Formmert, the court found unsettling the idea that one standard of review would apply to any and all areas of plan interpretation within ERISA simply because the plan grants discretionary authority upon the plan administrator. John Blair and Formmert were concerned about the implications that approach would have upon plan participants and beneficiaries. Both were concerned that discretionary language will covertly cover plan administrators' action with the arbitrary and capricious standard from a court's radar.<sup>254</sup> Thus, the Second Circuit identifies a critical aspect of plan interpretation – that all areas of plan interpretation within ERISA are not the same, and thus should not implicate a default standard of review without a court's approval.<sup>255</sup> John Blair explained that several acts of plan interpretation implicate different fiduciary standards, thus warranting different levels of deference.<sup>256</sup> Specifically, John Blair stated that in challenging a trustee in a denial of benefit context, “the issue is not whether the trustees have sacrificed the interests of the beneficiaries as a class in favor of some third party's interests, but whether the trustees have correctly balanced the interests of present claimants against the interests of future claimants[.]” <sup>252</sup> See Frommert, 738 F.3d at 531–33 (noting that a flexible analytical approach that considers whether a fiduciaries acts have violated other ERISA provisions is necessary to determine whether a fiduciary's acts are arbitrary or capricious); John Blair, 26 F.3d 360.

---

<sup>253</sup> Id.

<sup>254</sup> See John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369.

<sup>255</sup> Id.

<sup>256</sup> John Blair, 26 F.3d at 369 (internal quotation marks omitted).

As a result, the circumstance would dictate the appropriate level of discretion.<sup>257</sup>

The Ninth Circuit, however, has taken a simplistic but dangerous approach.<sup>258</sup> The Ninth Circuit suggest that the arbitrary and capricious standard should apply to all ERISA plan interpretation provisions. The Ninth Circuit, in Tibble, reasoned that the arbitrary and capricious standard is derived from trust principles, which has continuously served as the gap filler for ERISA, and hence justify its application to all ERISA plan interpretation provisions.<sup>259</sup> Perhaps the Ninth Circuit should not kill the proverbial birds with one stone.

Tibble's across-the-board discretion to plan administrators and trustees leaves a number of new issues unanswered. Tibble grants deference to plan administrator and trustees on issues concerning plan interpretation. But Tibble does not set out rules, standards, or parameters for such fiduciaries' interpretation. One is left with the proposition that a plan administrator has uninhibited interpretative discretion, if the plan grants some discretion, so long as such interpretation does not amount to an abuse of discretion. Given the expansive powers granted upon plan administrators interpreting the plan, Tibble did not adopt remedial safeguards in light of increasing trustees' powers, nor define what would amount to an abuse of discretion. Tibble's blanket discretion would now include issues that historically received a heightened standard of review.<sup>260</sup> Tibble proposes that all plan interpretation claims must receive an arbitrary and capricious standard of review.<sup>261</sup> The deferential standard of review, among others, would apply to health care plans, disability plans, accidental death plans, and certain provisions of the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act.<sup>262</sup>

While Tibble takes an across-the-board deference approach, ERISA does not. ERISA has different rules for different plans and different circumstances affecting plan participants and beneficiary rights. For example, ERISA's strict participation, vesting, and funding requirements apply to defined contribution and defined benefit plans, but does not apply to welfare benefit plans.<sup>263</sup> Consequently, Tibble has provided plan administrators with an unfettered powerful tool to pursue the unannounced

---

<sup>257</sup> Id.

<sup>258</sup> See Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>259</sup> Id.

<sup>260</sup> See Langbein, supra note 59, at 1339. See generally Colleen E. Medill, INTRODUCTION TO EMPLOYEE BENEFITS LAW: POLICY AND PRACTICE 519 (3rd ed. 2011).

<sup>261</sup> Tibble, 711 F.3d at 1077.

<sup>262</sup> 75 Fed. Reg. 43, 329 (2014)(explaining regulations on new claim procedures under the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act).

<sup>263</sup> ERISA §§ 201(1), 301(a)(1) (2014).

but realistic practicalities of trust administration, like insurance – a dedicated unwillingness to payout claims.

As a result, Tibble increases the strain between other limiting ERISA provisions and its across-the-board deference standard. Several ERISA provisions, such as the enumeration of Congress’s intent, limit plan sponsors or drafters from creating self-serving clauses.<sup>264</sup> As such, self-serving clauses that defeat Firestone’s nonderential review, a prerequisite to obtaining deferential review, arguably come in conflict with fiduciaries’ duties and ERISA’s purpose of promoting plan participant’s and beneficiaries’ interest. The across-the-board deference fails to account for essential remedial safeguards necessary to effectuate the balance sought by Congress.

Moreover, the Sixth and Third Circuits hold that neither an across-the-board approach, as in the Ninth Circuit, or a strict reading of Firestone, as in the Second Circuit, controls the analysis to determine the standard of review when a plan grants discretion upon a trustee.<sup>265</sup> The Sixth and Third Circuits fall in the middle.<sup>266</sup> They suggest that external factors like the nature of the conflict of interest or whether a trustee’s act was in bad faith warrant consideration. The Sixth and Third Circuits do not identify a laundry list of factors, suggesting that the responsibility of identifying those factors are left to the reviewing court. They are simply silent on the issue of what factors warrant consideration but suggest that the consideration of external factors and the scope of evidentiary review may be liberalized.

The Sixth Circuit proscribed the wholesale importation of trust principles to all ERISA plan interpretation claims but accept that the arbitrary and capricious standard should be applied outside the denial of benefits context.<sup>267</sup> The Third Circuit followed, in Moench, by recognizing that “the arbitrary and capricious standard of review allowed in Firestone should not be applied mechanically to all ERISA claims.”<sup>268</sup> Essentially, the Third and Sixth Circuit’s concern was the issue of increased deference for plan administrators who were granted discretion

---

<sup>264</sup> See ERISA § 410(a) (2014)(providing that “any provision in an agreement or instrument which purports to relieve a fiduciary from responsibility or liability for any responsibility, obligation, or duty under [ERISA fiduciary law] shall be void as against public policy.”).

<sup>265</sup> See Hunter v. Caliber Sys. Inc., 220 F.3d 702, 711 (6th Cir. 2000) (applying arbitrary and capricious standard outside the denial of benefits context but not stating how far it should be applied); Moench v. Robertson, 62 F.3d 553, 565–66 (3rd Cir. 1995)(applying arbitrary and capricious standard to fiduciary breaches but not stating what other context warrant the arbitrary and capricious analysis).

<sup>266</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 711; Moench, 62 F.3d at 565–66.

<sup>267</sup> Hunter, 220 F.3d at 710.

<sup>268</sup> Moench, 62 F.3d at 565.

by the plan and the lack of similar increased protections for plan participants and beneficiaries. Respectively, the Moench and Hunter holdings hinted to remedial safeguards in reviewing a plan administrator's actions; both courts considered factors such as bad faith or acts otherwise contrary to law to determine whether the administrator's acts were arbitrary and capricious.

Ultimately, The Second Circuit is well behind its time, while the Ninth Circuit is well ahead of its time without regard to beneficiary and plan participant rights and without adopting parallel remedial safeguard in light of aggrandizing administrator interpretative powers. The Sixth and Third Circuits have taken a step in the right direction by considering external factors when determining whether a trustee's actions were arbitrary and capricious. Conclusively, the Sixth and Third Circuits come closer to reaching a healthy balance — the promotion of employer sponsored ERISA plans and the protection of plan participants and beneficiaries.

Therefore, the next step is to create an analytical framework that fits within the structure of Firestone's progeny and that reflects the healthy balance of promoting plan creation and protecting plan participants through added remedial provisions and factors. In order to resolve this problem and recalibrate the balance between plan creation and participant protection, remedial safeguards must be present. If a court is to adopt an across-the-board deference approach, as propounded in Tibble, the adoption of remedial safeguards, in the form of enlarging the scope of evidentiary review to consider any and all factors that assist the court in finding an arbitrary and capricious act are warranted. Specifically, in reviewing whether plan interpretation was arbitrary and capricious, the court could, among others, consider the following factors: 1) whether the plan administrator failed to account for factors necessary for an objective interpretation; 2) whether the plan administrator's explanation for the denial is legitimate and founded upon a reasonable interpretation of the plan; 3) whether the interpretation has a rational connection with the facts influencing such interpretation; 4) whether previous interpretation of same provision under the same circumstance are consistent; or 5) whether external factors, such as an employer's business plan, influenced the administrator to interpret the plan differently, albeit objectively.

2. Where the Supreme Court Missed its Mark

ERISA was enacted to remedy defects in the private retirement system. Specifically, Congress explicitly sought to create and initiate the creation of adequate remedial safeguards with respect to administration and operation of ERISA plans.<sup>269</sup> To fully comply with Congress's intent, ERISA's multifaceted and complex composition requires more than an across-the-board deference approach, as found in Tibble. While courts have recently landed on the side of simplicity,<sup>270</sup> the imbalance between protecting individual pension rights and promoting the creation of private employer-sponsored retirement plans is not justified. The benefit of cloaking fiduciaries with across-the-board deference, without increasing procedural safeguards, is unsuitable in light of Congressional intent and does not outweigh the anticipated cost.

ERISA depends on the delicate balance between maintaining and promoting the creation of such plans through incentives and safeguards for plan sponsors and the protections afforded to plan participants and beneficiaries. Through enactments and amendments, Congress intended an equal balance to protect plan participants' and beneficiaries' interest. Yet, the Supreme Court's decisions add to the imbalance by continuing to make ERISA an employer-favoring statute favoring employers over employees.<sup>271</sup> The arbitrary and capricious standard of review has solidified an illusion of adequate remedial safeguards. In reality, the arbitrary and capricious standard cloaks fiduciaries and trustees with a delicate, though resilient, veil of indemnity creating a culture of lacking consequences for fiduciaries and trustees to the impactful detriment of plan participants and beneficiaries.

First, the Firestone Court failed to consider whether ERISA's purpose would be better served by allowing plan drafters the ability to bypass the de novo standard.<sup>272</sup> Scholars have noted that granting a plan drafter the ability to mold the plan to his sole interest contradicts Congress' purpose to restrict private autonomy.<sup>273</sup> Congress imposed trust principles to inhibit plan administrator's unilateral decision making and to promote the plan participants' and beneficiaries' interest.<sup>274</sup> Firestone made de novo review the default standard for reviewing a plan interpretation issue but did not consider whether plan construction that defeats de novo review is consistent with ERISA's purpose and provisions.

---

<sup>269</sup> See 29 U.S.C. § 1001(a) (2013).

<sup>270</sup> See Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 117 (2008) (expressing concern with the consequence of adding complexity to ERISA's already complex statute, the Court belittled Congressional concerns of creating safety laches to protect plan participants and beneficiaries for sake of simplicity and judicial economy).

<sup>271</sup> See Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506 (2010); see also Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105 (2008).

<sup>272</sup> See Langbein, supra note 59, at 1322-23, 1337 (explaining that the de novo standard of review better serves ERISA's legislative purpose).

<sup>273</sup> Langbein, supra note 59, at 1335-36.

<sup>274</sup> H.R. REP. NO. 533, at 5-8, reprinted in 1974 U.S.C.C.A.N. at 4643-46 (1973).

The practical consequence of Firestone and its progeny is evident in Tibble. In order to fall within the arbitrary and capricious standard, plan administrators or trustees simply need to amend plan language to prescribe discretion.<sup>275</sup> Now, at least in the Ninth Circuit, plan administrators will be cloaked by the arbitrary and capricious standard without added checks and balances.<sup>276</sup> The Ninth Circuit's across-the-board approach, coupled with Conkright, may further encourage plan administrators to adopt unreasonable interpretations of plans initially, in anticipation that a second bite at the apple will ensue if their first interpretation is questioned or held unreasonable.<sup>277</sup> This, among other concerns, undermines the prompt resolution of disputes over benefits, driving up litigation cost or discouraging employees from challenging a plan administrators' decision all together.

Next, Glenn did not want to abandon Firestone.<sup>278</sup> No change, but an addition, to the deferential standard of review was made.<sup>279</sup> Trust law was, once again, the fundamental premise for establishing high deference.<sup>280</sup> Glenn, while citing to the Restatement of Trusts, reasoned that a conflicted trustee's claim determination does not switch the standard back to de novo review.<sup>281</sup> The Court, however, required that a reviewing judge take "account of the conflict when evaluating determining whether the trustee, subjectively or procedurally, has abused his discretion."<sup>282</sup> Specifically, a conflict is but one factor in determining whether the trustee abused his discretion and does not automatically raise judicial scrutiny above the arbitrary and capricious standard.<sup>283</sup>

Glenn failed to explicitly state what other factors may be considered to determine whether a trustee has abused his discretion.<sup>284</sup> Glenn emphasized that "[b]enefits decisions arise in too many contexts, concern too many circumstances, and can relate in too many different ways to conflicts . . . for us to come up with a one-size-fits-all procedural system that is likely to promote fair and accurate review."<sup>285</sup> While the Court promoted a method of review that increased the evidentiary scope to consider "all the factors" necessary in examining a possible arbitrary and

---

<sup>275</sup> Tibble v. Edison Int'l, 711 F.3d 1061, 1076 (9th Cir. 2013).

<sup>276</sup> Id. at 1077.

<sup>277</sup> See Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. at 509 (2010) (explaining that an "honest mistake" is not enough to amount to an arbitrary and capricious finding).

<sup>278</sup> Firestone Tire and Rubber Co. v. Bruch, 489 U.S. 101, 116 (1989).

<sup>279</sup> Id. at 115.

<sup>280</sup> Id.

<sup>281</sup> Metropolitan Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 115 (2008).

<sup>282</sup> Id.

<sup>283</sup> Id. at 116–17 (internal quotation marks omitted).

<sup>284</sup> Id. at 117.

<sup>285</sup> Id. at 116.

capricious act, it failed to require or structure what “all the factors” meant in for concerns of making adopting a bright line rule. Hence, one is left with the following questions: 1) does “all of the factors” mean any and all factors that can help a court determine whether an arbitrary and capricious act exist; 2) should the court afford more weight to some factors over others; 3) does “all of the factors” mean that the judge can only consider those factors presented by counsel or can a judge consider other factors sua sponte; or 4) does “all of the factors” only mean the factors establishing the conflict of interest? Therefore, further clarity is necessary to determine the breath of factors that may be considered by a reviewing judge.

Furthermore, the Conkright Court continued to recognize the unclear state of trust law with regard to the question of trustee deference, but nonetheless faithfully followed the spirit of trust principles.<sup>286</sup> The Conkright court solidified its faithfulness to trust law even when it recognized that trust law was originally intended to serve only as a starting point, from which the court would then determine whether sufficient evidence supports departure from common trust law requirements.<sup>287</sup> The Court explained that trust law warrants departure from common-law trust deference “when reason indicates that the trustee will not exercise their discretion fairly, by showing, for example, that the trustee previously acted in bad faith.”<sup>288</sup> One good-faith mistake does not divest the trustee of discretion.<sup>289</sup> In effect, a good-faith mistake, like the conflict addressed in Glenn, must now be weighed as one factor in determining whether the trustee or plan administrator abused his discretion.

Conkright explains that a conflict of interest alone does not amount to an arbitrary and capricious finding and neither does a single honest mistake alone. Conkright, however does not answer whether those two factors coupled together amount to an arbitrary and capricious finding; nor does Conkright explain what factors together or alone amount to an arbitrary and capricious finding. While a contrary and valid view is that most ERISA plan interpretation claims are fact-sensitive, Conkright nonetheless fails to guide courts in deciding what factors, beyond an honest mistake or conflict, should be afforded weight and considered.

For these reasons, Firestone and its progeny leave many questions unanswered in light of the recent Ninth Circuit pronouncement in Tibble. In order to carry out ERISA’s purpose to protect plan participants and beneficiaries and promote plan creation, a solution must adopt ERISA’s

---

<sup>286</sup> Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 516 (2010).

<sup>287</sup> Id.

<sup>288</sup> Id. at 514.

<sup>289</sup> Id. at 518.

overall purpose. The ideal solution keeps the balance at a horizontal equilibrium.

3. A Proposed Solution

This Comment asserts that the ideal arbitrary and capricious analysis identifies ERISA's complexity to allow the enlargement of evidentiary scope to consider any and all factors that may assist a judge in deciding whether an administrator's plan interpretation is arbitrary and capricious. The consideration of any and all factors to assist an arbitrary and capricious determination does not contradict Firestone and its progeny's standard. This essential approach warrants a method of review that will impose adequate remedial safeguards upon plan administrators and plan participants to uphold the careful balance Congress envisioned. As the judicial pendulum swings towards increased discretion for plan administrators, this comment asserts that courts have not likewise increased remedial safeguards for plan participants and beneficiaries.

This Comment proposes staying within the high-threshold arbitrary and capricious standard, as applied to all plan interpretation claims when the plan grants discretionary authority upon the administrator, while including remedial safeguards that enlarge the evidentiary scope upon review of an administrator's plan interpretation. Analogous to the analysis in Firestone, Glenn, and Conkright, an adapted importation of trust principles to the arbitrary and capricious standard would include the use of factors to increase the possibility of determining that an administrator's acts are arbitrary and capricious.<sup>290</sup> The more factors one considers, the more likely an administrator's acts could be found to be arbitrary and capricious. For example, in Glenn, in evaluating whether an abuse of discretion existed, the Court required the consideration of external factors, such as a conflict of interest, thus inferring that other factors merit consideration.<sup>291</sup> In Conkright, the Court, in determining whether the plan administrator abused his discretion, considered the factor of acting in bad faith.<sup>292</sup>

In light of the lack of uniformity on the judicial standard of review in plan interpretation cases, the Supreme Court of the United States should fashion a rule with remedial safeguards that require judges to consider any and all factors that assist a court in determining whether a plan administrator's act is arbitrary and capricious. Requiring the court to consider any and all factors decreases the judiciary's discretion, but also

---

<sup>290</sup> RESTATEMENT (SECOND) OF TRUSTS § 187 (2013) (an example of six enumerated factors used to evaluate an abuse of discretion).

<sup>291</sup> Metro. Life Ins. Co. v. Glenn, 554 U.S. 105, 110 (2008).

<sup>292</sup> Conkright v. Frommert, 559 U.S. 506, 514 (2010).

decreases appellate review as the judge would leave no stone unturned. Thus, to cure the current imbalance and assist courts in finding what type of interpretative discretion is too much discretion or arbitrary and capricious, the factors should include, among others, incompetence, conflict of interest, ulterior motives or surrounding circumstances independent from a conflict of interest, and bad faith.

Moreover, another remedial safeguard may include the help of an independent arbiter in the appeals process. The independent arbiter can interpret plan language and determine whether the administrator's act was arbitrary and capricious. If the arbiter finds in favor of the plan participant or beneficiary, the decision can create a presumption in favor of the plan participant or beneficiary, thus shifting the burden onto the plan administrator to demonstrate that his act was not arbitrary and capricious. If the independent arbiter does not find an abuse of discretion, the plan participant or beneficiary is squarely where he would have been had an independent arbiter not been commissioned. The independent arbiter could be paid by the plan participant individually, if he so elects to avail himself of that procedure, so as to reduce wasteful spending of plan assets for individual participant's or beneficiary's benefit.

VI. CONCLUSION

An across-the-board deference approach, alone, is unwarranted in light of Congressional intent and Firestone and its progeny. As proposed by Tibble, as long as deference is granted somewhere in the plan, interpretative deference would include defining health conditions and benefit determinations. Tibble, in failing to add procedural safeguards to its across-the-board deference approach, falls short of reaching a healthy balance so fruitfully sought by Congress and clearly identified by courts. The reasoning behind adopting across-the-board deference derives from precedent that adopts the spirit of trust principles into ERISA. Trust principles, however, are not constant under all scenarios and circumstances. Thus, a change in circumstance warrants a change in analysis.

Trust principles promote discretion when the plan document grants discretion to a plan administrator's interpretation under a certain circumstance; the circumstance in Firestone being a denial of benefits claims. The legal ramifications and policy implication of across-the-board deference requires the adoption of additional safeguards. A court would be injudicious to simply point to trust law as the be all and end all of interpretative discretion, if the plan says so and for the sake of simplicity. Each circumstance or plan provision where interpretative discretion is granted calls for a consideration of external factors that may outweigh the deference suggested by trust law principles. For example, Tibble's across-the-board deference would allow plan administrators, usually non-medical professional, to interpret medical conditions under a high threshold standard to determine whether such condition falls within the plan's language. And, while such practice is exercised today, a compromise must result from increase deference and lacking safeguards. Increasing safeguards, in a time where the courts are leaning toward increased interpretative deference, is only natural.

The resulting policy implication would likely avail plan participants and beneficiaries to the full receipt of retirement benefits, which results in fewer retirees depending on the United States' Social Security or other governmental benefits. Plan participants continue to fulfill plan vesting requirements to later suffer a deprivation of anticipated benefits because the plan administrator interpreted a provision ever so slightly in the sponsor's favor. Considering the preferential tax treatment and judicial stance on heightened deference, inadequate safeguards continue to stagnate. The continued well-being and security of millions of employees and their dependents are directly affected by these plans and plan administrator's interpretation. A national public interest is at stake. Ultimately, implementing and adopting safeguards will equalize the balance between plan participants and beneficiaries, and plan administrators.