INTERNATIONAL TRADE LAW

This course examines the process and substance of international trade law, focusing primarily on the law of the World Trade Organization and secondarily on the law of regional trade organizations and the foreign trade law of the United States. We will begin with an overview of issues relating to the concept of free trade, the institutionalization of international trade, the relationship between U.S. and international trade law, and WTO dispute settlement. Next, we will cover the legal principles and rules of international trade.

Throughout the course, we will refer to economic and political debates and use analytical methods in these disciplines to augment our understanding of international trade law. A major objective of the course is to learn how to engage international trade law in a variety of different practice-oriented settings. Towards that end, this course feature case studies and case-based advocacy.
