

DEAN JOHN P. LOFTUS

DEDICATION

The publication of the inaugural issue of the Seton Hall Law Review is a significant event in the history of our school. After experimenting for two years with an intramural edition, the Staff, with the approval of the Faculty, decided to "go public." We, the Editors, should like to mark this occasion by dedicating our first issue to one who has made a distinct contribution to our school and our profession, Dean John P. Loftus.

Dean Loftus began his career at Seton Hall in 1951 after more than twenty years as an active practitioner. He demonstrated his ability as a member of the faculty, became a full professor and was appointed Dean of the Law School in 1961. He has retained contact with the students through his Property courses and, outside the classroom, has remained easily accessible to one and all.

The example he has set is one of sincerity, honesty, integrity and a true sense of professionalism. On questions of principle, academic or otherwise, he stands staunch and unyielding, yet he demonstrates initiative and flexibility where meaningful, constructive change is warranted. The best interests of the students and the Law School are his prime concern.

We thank him for the continued support and encouragement he has enthusiastically provided and salute his undying devotion and dedication to this institution.
